With the November presidential elections nearing, the current roller-coaster election season comes at a time when the country is at a level of political division that is both narrow and deep. Indeed, there is reason to believe that a concentration of presidential powers is helping drive Americans into polarized camps. Presidents are becoming more powerful on behalf of their political parties, and as a result may be less capable of governing on behalf of all Americans.

This insightful discussion will put the current election into the context of Miller Center's efforts to address this bigger challenge. It will discuss how the presidency might work better with Congress; how the President and Executive Branch might better use the powers it does have; how we might reform the presidential selection process; how we might hold presidents accountable; and how we might better equip presidents to unify the country.

About the Miller Center
The Miller Center is a nonpartisan affiliate of the University of Virginia that specializes in presidential scholarship, public policy, and political history. The center injects its scholarship and recommendations inside Washington, DC directly to the nation's leaders. Founded in 1975 through the philanthropy of Burkett Miller, a 1914 graduate of the University of Virginia School of Law and former Miller & Martin partner, the center fosters civil and intellectual dialogue among diverse scholars, politicians, journalists, and citizens. The Miller Center believes that opposing positions can both have merit and that investigating questions of fact and discussing questions of opinion can lead to enlightened and beneficial compromise and public policy.
